

Professional attorneys and deputies

Acting as an attorney or deputy can be time-consuming and stressful. Having a professional involved can provide peace of mind that affairs will be properly taken care of.

What is the benefit of a professional attorney or deputy?

A professional attorney or deputy can add much needed objectivity, independence and experience to complex family situations. It ensures impartiality and the resulting avoidance of conflicts of interests between family members.

With our extensive expertise, we can provide total focus to the vulnerable person's affairs, providing peace of mind for the family and ensuring all the individual's legal and financial affairs are taken care of.

What does a professional attorney or deputy do?

A professional attorney or deputy should have regard to the professional standards set by the Office of the Public Guardian. There is an obligation, as for all attorneys and deputies, to keep appropriate financial records and to ensure that decisions are made in the best interests of the vulnerable person.

When we are appointed as professional attorney or deputy, our role often includes:

- Annual visits to the vulnerable person
- Considering the vulnerable person's wishes and feelings and their best interests in all decisions
- Care plan reviews
- Benefit reviews to ensure the individual receives the benefits they are entitled to
- Challenging care funding problems
- Dealing sensitively with family situations
- Sourcing additional case manager support and therapies, where required
- Keeping financial accounts
- Seeking appropriate advice on asset investment
- Property management, letting and sales, where appropriate
- Considering appropriate Court of Protection applications, where appropriate, including statutory wills and gifting applications;
- Undertaking tax returns
